

Sports In The 1920's

By: Derrek Wilder & Michael Valenzuela

Background Facts

Sports in the 1920's

Sports in the 1920'S got popular because post-WWI, Americans got shorter workweeks and started to earn more money and more free time to spend more time watching sports for need for escape and enjoyment. Another reason is because new technology like radios were introduced and people would listen to the sport that was going on through the radio. For example, the first ever sports match that was broadcasted on the radio was a boxing match between Johnny Ray and Johnny Dundee.

1920's Baseball, a decade characterized by the "live-ball era," which saw a surge in offense, led by superstars like Babe Ruth, and a shift in popularity towards Urban Ballparks. Boxing in the 1920's, was a booming, glamorous, yet gritty sport, moving from semi-illegality to mainstream popularity with stars like Jack Dempsey, featuring ethnic pride, huge crowds, less regulation, and the drawn of radio broadcasts.

The Great Jack Dempsey

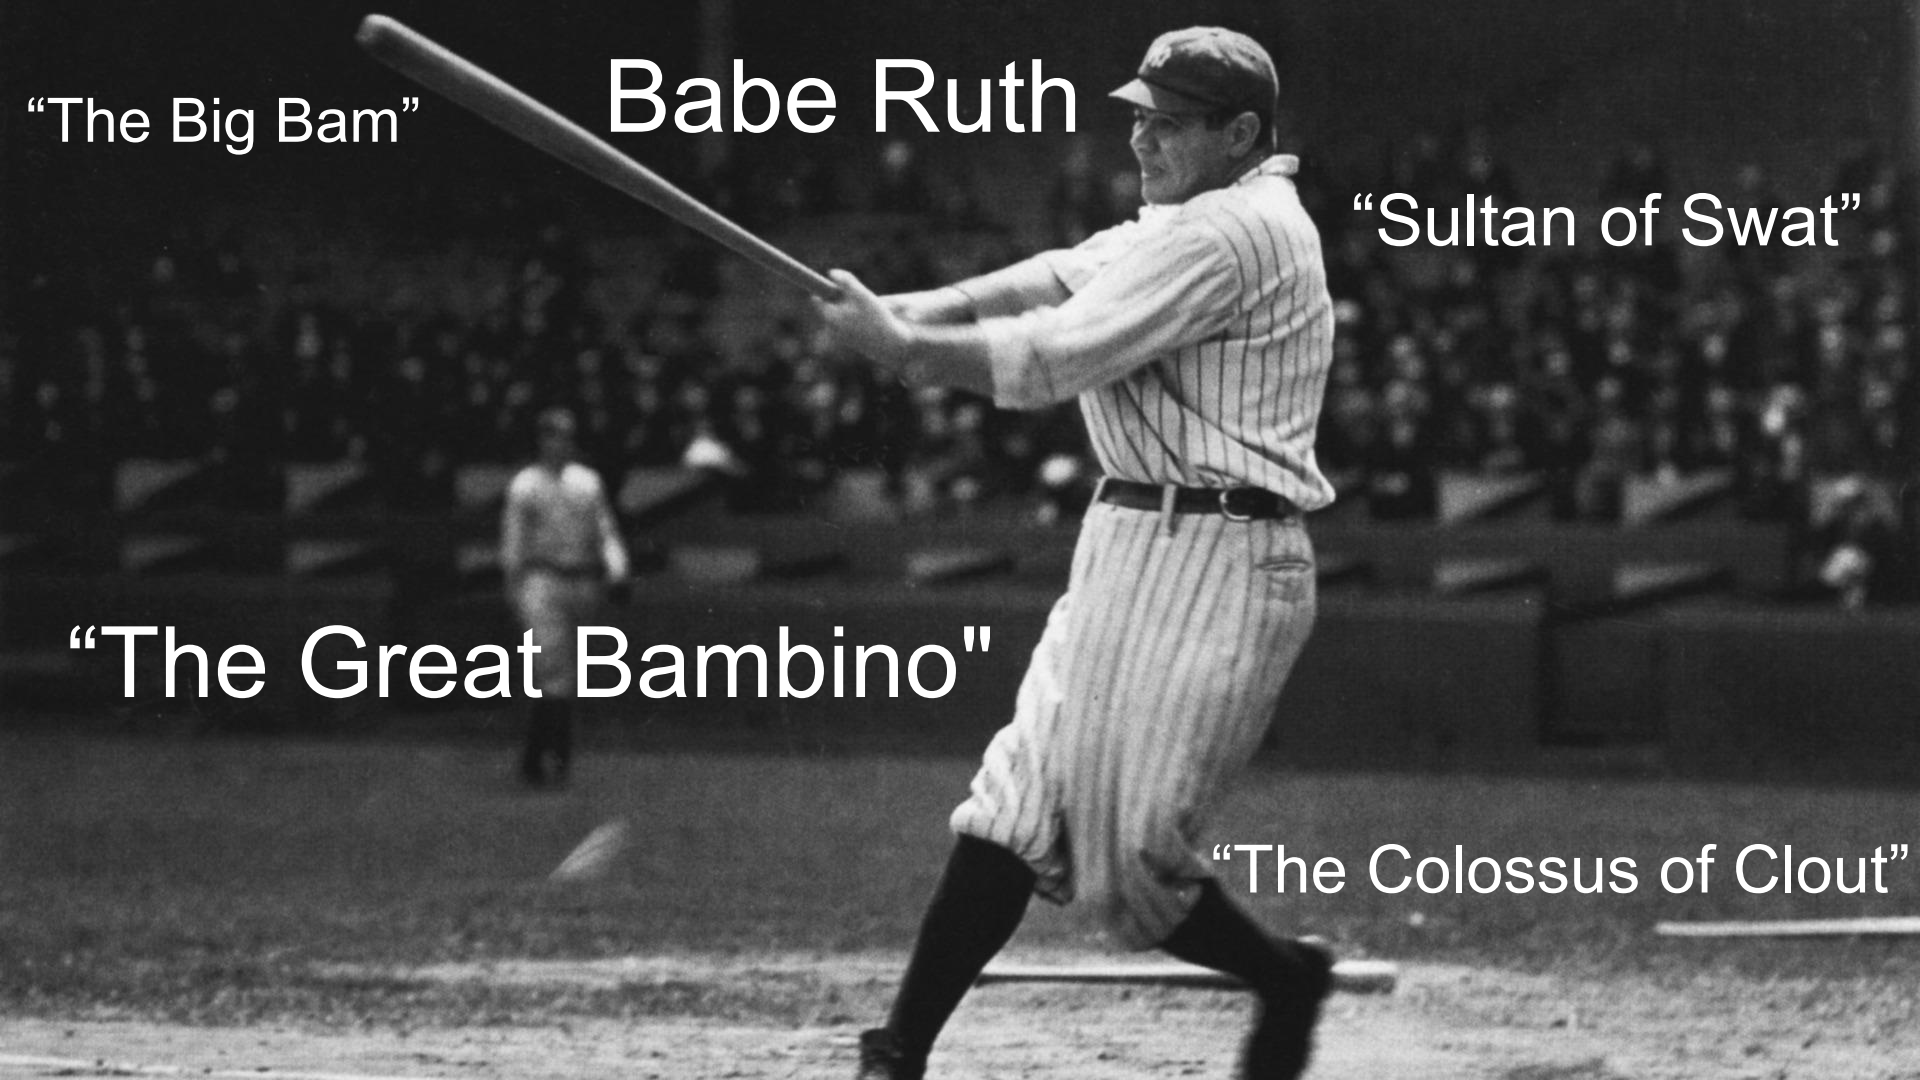

Facts About Jack Dempsey

Jack Dempsey, also known as the “Manassa Mauler,” was a 1920’s heavyweight boxing champion known for his aggressive bobbing/weaving style. He won the title from Jess Willard in 1919 and lost it to Gene Tunney in 1926. He later became a popular NYC restaurateur and WW2 Coast guard officer.

Jack Dempsey was born as William Harrison Dempsey in Manassa, Colorado. He was born into a poor mormon family as one of thirteen kids who all struggled. He left home at fourteen, fighting in rough camps to make ends meet. As a teenager, Dempsey became a hobo, traveling the west and working in coal mines and lumber camps.

Jack Dempsey became a boxer out of necessity, he learned to fight in rough mining towns by challenging men in saloons for money. Taking his older brothers name, and eventually getting discovered by manager Jack Kearns.

Babe Ruth

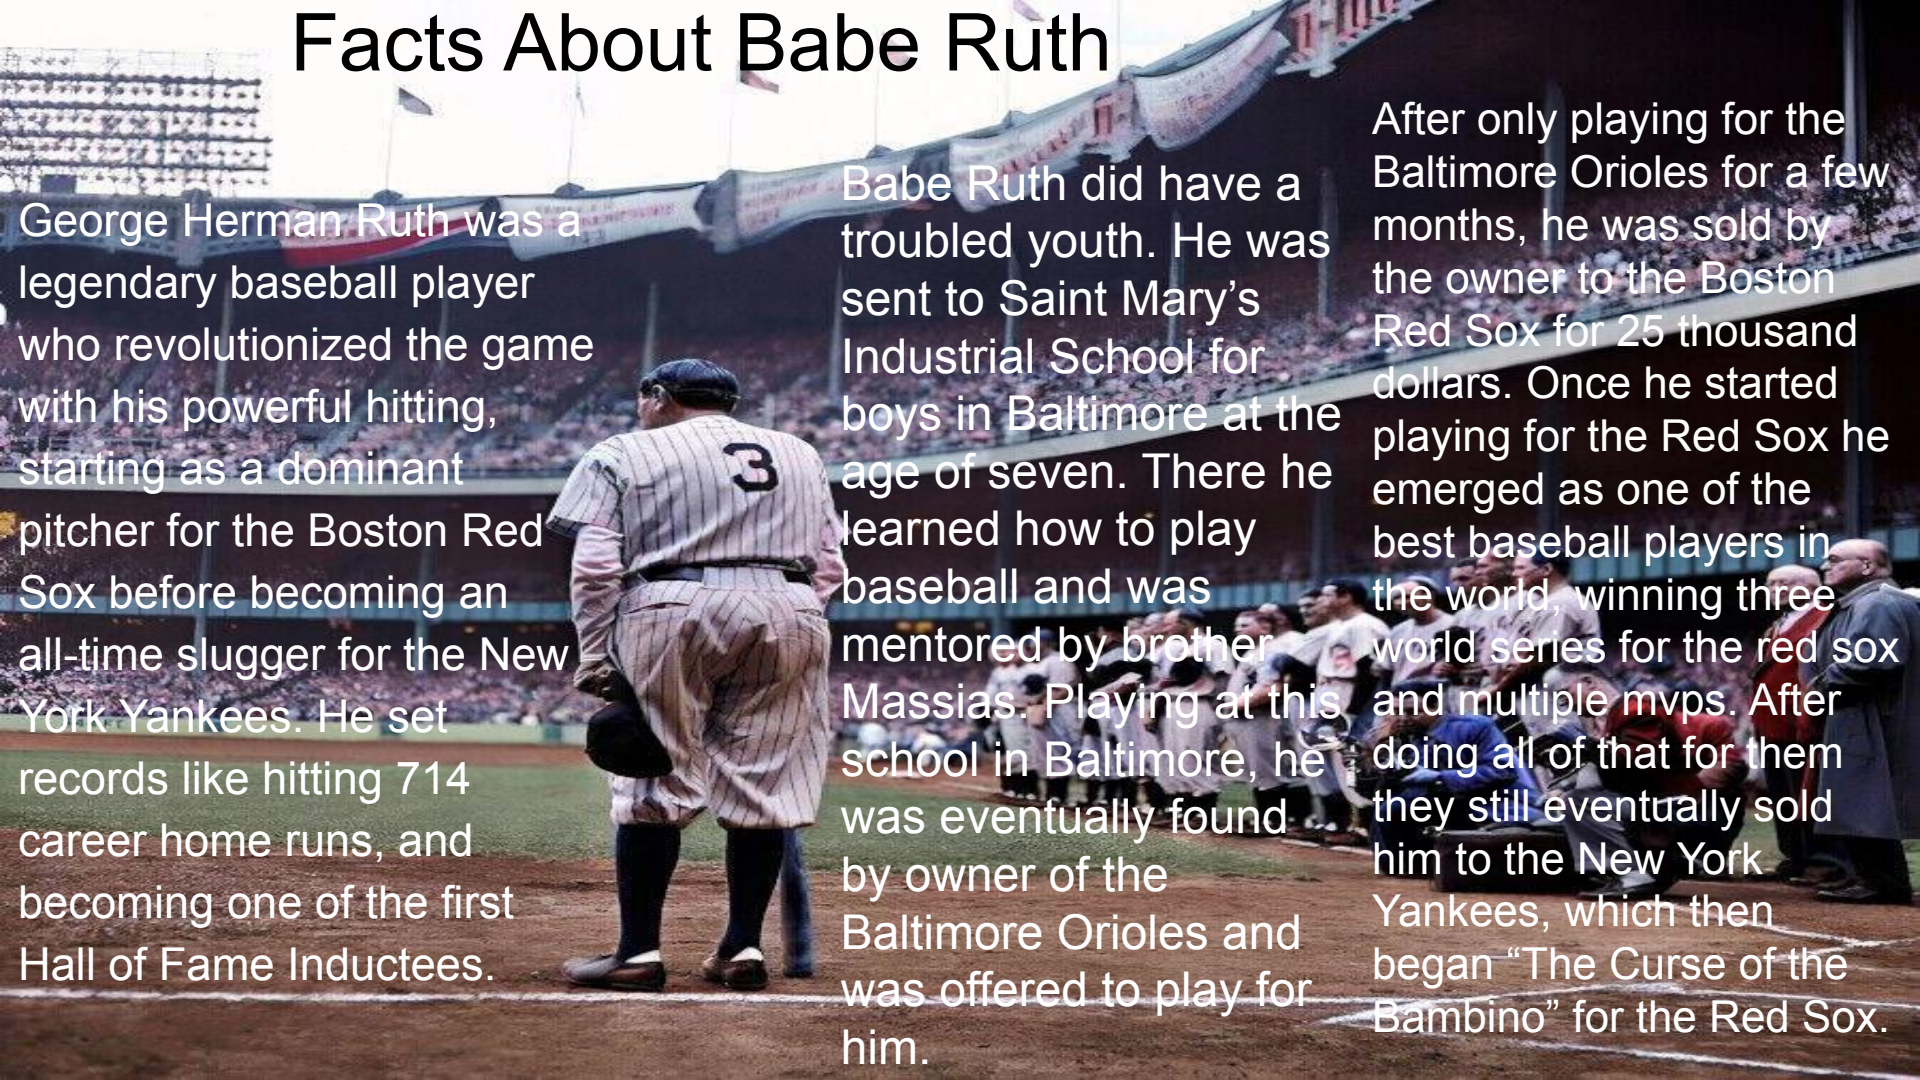

“The Big Bam”

“Sultan of Swat”

“The Great Bambino”

“The Colossus of Clout”

Facts About Babe Ruth

George Herman Ruth was a legendary baseball player who revolutionized the game with his powerful hitting, starting as a dominant pitcher for the Boston Red Sox before becoming an all-time slugger for the New York Yankees. He set records like hitting 714 career home runs, and becoming one of the first Hall of Fame Inductees.

Babe Ruth did have a troubled youth. He was sent to Saint Mary's Industrial School for boys in Baltimore at the age of seven. There he learned how to play baseball and was mentored by brother Massias. Playing at this school in Baltimore, he was eventually found by owner of the Baltimore Orioles and was offered to play for him.

After only playing for the Baltimore Orioles for a few months, he was sold by the owner to the Boston Red Sox for 25 thousand dollars. Once he started playing for the Red Sox he emerged as one of the best baseball players in the world, winning three world series for the red sox and multiple mvps. After doing all of that for them they still eventually sold him to the New York Yankees, which then began "The Curse of the Bambino" for the Red Sox.